O MERCHA C. BARNEN AND A. WALLACE ON THE

(that is, if the check to impresse fell chiefly on the seeds), there seeds which were provided with ever so little more down, would in the long run be most disseminated; hence a greater number of seeds thus formed would germinate, and would tend to produce plants inheriting the slightly better-adopted down.*

Besides this natural means of selection, by which those individuals are preserved, whether in their egg, or larval, or stature state, which are best adopted to the place they fill in nature, there is a second agency at work in most unisatual animals, tending to produce the same effect, namely, the struggle of the males for the females. These struggles are generally decided by the law of battle, but it the case of birds, apparently, by the charms of their song, by their beauty or Hele pewer of courtship, as in the denoing reck-thresh of Grozens. The most rigorour and healthy males, implying perfect adaptation, must generally gain the victory in their contests. This kind of selection, however, is less rigorous than the other; it does not require the death of the loss successful, but gives to them fewer descendants. The struggle fulls, moreover, at a time of year when find is generally abundant, and perhaps the effect cloudy produced would be the modification of the econology sernal characters, which are not related to the power of obtaining food, or to deligen from enemies, but to fighting with or rivaling other males. The result of this struggle amongst the males may be compared in some respects to that produced by those agriculturists who pay has attention to the excelul selection of all their young saintals, and more to the occasional use of a choice pitte.

II. Abdract of a Letter from C. Dunwer, Esq., to Prof. Ann Gunt, Eastern, U.S., shated Down, September Sch, 1937.

1. It is wonderful what the principle of selection by man, that is the picking out of individuals with any deviced quality, and breeding from them, and again picking cut, can do. Hern breaders have been notounded at their own results. They can act an differences inappreciable to an unreducated eye. Selection has been suitedisally followed in Harope for only the last half century; but it was necessionally, and even in some degree mathedically, followed in the most ancient times. There must have been also a kind of unreassions edication from a rescote period, manually in
